Tim Samaras' Official Statement on Facebook:

"Being with Discovery has been an incredible experience. Did you know that Discovery is one of the top 100 places to work? My highlight of being with Discovery is when they asked me to volunteer for 'Habitat for Humanity' back in the Fall. There is incredible talent and incredible employees that I've met during my 'tenure' at Discovery. This is a company that really cares for it's employees.

Alas, they have to answer to their shareholders regarding the ratings for their shows they produce. They have to make tough decisions on what shows stay, and shows that have to go. Storm Chasers was a VERY expensive show to put on, and quite frankly, the overall population didn't grasp 'Storm Chasers' as a top show anymore-to be displaced by 'Gold Rush', 'Sons of Guns', and others. As 'weather weenies' we think this is an injustice, but in reality--it's not a big deal to the general population--most folks don't really care about tornadoes unless it affects them directly. Ratings suggested that the midwest absolutely loved the show, but both coasts(population that drives ratings) really didn't care.

There was a production change right in the middle of the show sometime in early May that had affected the show big-time. Personally, I feel the fate of the show was decided last May. There was no advertising, no promotion(Reed didn't go on his promotional road trip), and we wound up with the Sunday slot--competing against Sunday Night Football. We were on Wednesday night a year ago. Why?

I won't comment on the editorial content, as nearly 100% of the viewers have commented accurately. Far too many 'creative liberties' were allowed.

I will comment that TWISTEX--despite the commentator's narration on the final episode--was NOT a failure.

One will never know where myself, Reed and Sean will appear once again. I will say that it was an absolute pleasure to be featured in the show along with such great talent.

Thank you Discovery for three incredible years."

Honestly, if Discovery was going to continue with the series the way it was going- a series of personality cults and squabbles, maybe its better off gone. :S It didn't have to be that way, and that is what annoys me. :angry: What bigger 'character' could a TV show possibly want than a EF-scale tornado? :unsure: If the season's tornadoes had been the central character, with the scientific chasers in supporting audience mentor roles, it could have been what we all were hoping for. Discovery did a fabulous job of exactly that in their special about Tuscaloosa (which cost a cousin of mine her home), and it was excellent in both content and over all quality. :) So, now we will be checking with this site, as well as Twistex's site, and some of the others as well. The series was more like being there without contributing to the traffic jam. I will miss it, more for what it could have been than for what it was.

You know, I would love to see the Storm Chaser teams carry on with another show on another channel where the emphasis is on the science of meteorology and the study of tornados. Maybe the Weather Channel?

Anyways, Discovery Channel seems to be all about the drama of human interaction anymore, at one time it was an educational channel and I'm sad to see it take it's current route...I had a feeling after the last season of Storm Chasers was over that the show might get axed, it did a terrible job following one of the worst years for tornados on record instead focusing on the human drama element.

Yes. You would think that with a record number of tornadoes they had a golden opportunity for a fantastic season on the series. But, instead, they threw it away. Their result had a great start, but the rest of the season was petty and annoying with a tornado or so in the background without a 'speaking role'. A waste. Sigh... :angry:

But one thing is certain, I'm going to miss a new season to watch.

If you really want to say something, why not go to Discovery Channel's site and contact them?

The problem with this past season is, I think, they tried to handle Storm chasers the way they did American Chopper. That is, make it interesting by highlighting any and all internal squabbles into major strife. Considering they had tornadoes as the main character, with the chasers as supporting cast, I'd think that would have been more than enough strife. However...

Sad to hear. With that, the way Discovery Channel was taking the series last year was really disappointing. I know that the Discovery crew was mostly new & never even witnessed a tornado. So it was almost like a brand new show/format. Even though I'm going to miss the show. I think it was time to end it, with the way it was going. I'll always follow all the teams from the show, just not on The Discovery Channel anymore. :(

Ill be sad to see it go, but to be honest its probably run its course.

It would have been better produced as a straight documentary rather than the fake "reality tv" with squabbling and constant reminders of what you just saw and whats coming up next.

Come to think of it, cant remember the last proper documentary I've seen on Discovery. Do they even make them still?

One question for Reed - Where's the data? Its one thing to chase for fun, or money. I got the impression that Reed wants to be taken as a serious storm scientist in which case where are the publications of all that RADAR data?

The old "where's the data" comment.. :D

Well, I'll just say that as someone who has done scientific research.. these things take time.

You have to accumulate enough data to power your study. You must realize the nature of their research doesn't allow them to actively collect data every single day, and then you have to determine if the data is worth using..

I could go on and on, but basically what I am saying is.. this stuff takes time.. Most of the time it takes YEARS.

I hope that answers your question!

The Data is still being collected. Since Reed only has a few times to collect Data on supercells and tornadoes. I would say that within the next couple years he should be nearing enough data to begin researching and analyzing it. If you pay close attention to this site and to show you will hear about some of the data that was collected.

One a side note it is sad to see this show go but I am kinda glad as well. Mainly becuase discovery was way to much into the drama of the show and non of the science or even tornadoes. To be honest I wish reed could make his own show and have more of the science aspects of it. I missed the first couple of seasons when you the only talking was at the beginning of the show when they were deciding where to chase at.

I can't BELIEVE, Storm Chasers is cancelled. Of all the junk shows they have, they can't renew this one? We're in the year, of what should be a record setting, tornado season. It's not about the devastation, it's about watching weather heros, trying to save lives. With a laptop and a few instruments. How they're not recognized more as heros, is beyond me. Risking their lives, to study and measure one of natures, most devestating fury. Soldiers defend freedom, they're saving lives on the home front. The chase continues, but the full credit they deserve, gets replaced by a junk show. They actually cancel it, I'm canceling Discovery.

I am about to tell you the same thing I've told others- go to the Discovery site and tell THEM! We already agree with you. :) Meanwhile, come on over and visit. Professional tornado tours are a good way to go. Spring is not only Tornado Season, it is a time with good temperatures, and plenty to see even if the tornadoes fail to show up. Summer here, especially on the Western plains, is just as hot as Australia is in its summer. (And, we have the same huge distances that Australia has!) Try going to the South East, and you can add plenty of humidity to the summer heat. The whole area turns into a sauna. Not fun! Fall is a good time for tourists, but not so much for tornadoes. Winter... I don't know what to say about winter any more. This last one was schizophrenic. :dry:

Hi Janet,

I've already let Discovery know of my displeasure. I can't believe they are going to replace Storm Chasers with programs like Sons of Guns, American Chopper etc. I guess it comes down to $ and ratings which generally means targeting the Lowest Common Denominator. Not sure what its like in the States but we have plenty of people who like watching things that go Bang and guys building motorbikes.

We have had (in my part of the country at least) a Schizophrenic summer. Immense amount of rain and low temperatures have made it the coldest and wettest summer for over 50 years. So much for Global Warming eh? Only 1 day above 30C when we may have 30 or more. Actually, we are experiencing the La Nina weather pattern at the moment which generally produces lots of rain. Some places have had almost thei annual rainfall in this past week alone!And the meteorologists are saying there's even more rain to come in April. La Nina's sibling, El Nino means little rain and drought. The last El Nino influenced the weather patterns for years - some places suffered a 10 year drought.

Hi DirkinOz!
This year, our spring tried to start in January! February couldn't decide if it was winter or spring, and split the difference. Which has meant unstable air masses, the jet stream in really odd places, and tornadoes. If Discovery hadn't cancelled the series, they would already have had several twisters on digital film! However... If wishes were horses, a fine one I'd ride!
Last summer was exceptionally hot and mostly dry. Some areas that traditionally are considered to have soggy weather, like the South East coast of Georgia and Florida, are in drought conditions. Right now we have brush fires in Florida in palmetto scrub areas that are usually swampy, and good mostly, for rattle snakes, cotton mouths (another poisonous wet land snake), and some zebu cattle (not terribly good eating either). A tad too dry for alligators in most years though. And, although Florida isn't where you are likely to see an inland tornado except near an incoming hurricane (cyclone in your area), they do have ocean seaside thunderstorms with water spouts.

West Texas is in heavy drought, and has been for the past few years. Cattlemen have sold their cattle down to what they can feed, and there is heavy threat of fire as well. Water is strictly under rationing there. East Texas was under drought this past summer, but they have had a wet winter, which has really helped. Last summer the East of Texas was also under water rationing. Hope the current rains will hold them for awhile. The rainstorms there have also meant tornadoes, but much of Texas is range land, so there hasn't been that much damage to towns.

The german chanel where I used to see Stormchasers didnt even bother to send season 4 and 5. From what I haveve read here, season 2 and 3 semed to be the most liked seasons anyway, where season 4 and 5 appeared to be the beginning of the end anyway.

The people I talked with on the german forum wathed Stormchasers for many different reasons. There were weather nerds, of course. But also watchers who enjoyed the adrenalin kick when things got tough, wathers who enjoyed the scienticic content, the cars they used, not least the custom made Dominator and TIVs. The personal fuzz that were overplayed anyway did not cath the interest of those I have talked with. But it may indeed be a spice that makes the series more intense. However, no meal can consist of the spice alone, and that appears to have been the wasy Discocery cooked the recent seasons.

I think the current concept of Stormchasers has survived itself.

But there are still people out there chasing, and Reed has been good at communication what all this is about, and why they do it. Perhaps some day some other channel finds a new concept for a series that descries what these folks out there do to collect and study data recorded by chasers on location from tornadoes.
I have seen real good documentarys, one featuring Tim Samaras and his efforts of recording, as well as the first tests of the turtle probes in a wind tunnel. And recently there was a recent made documentary where Reed told about what the tornado chasing is about, why they do it, and the aims for the research. Tornadoes will be there, always, the will be chasen, always, and there will be focus on them from medias, so the road is paved for new documentarys.
